Look for "The Apprentice" to come to you next fall from Miami or Las Vegas or Chicago or ...

Ivanka Trump notes that the Trump Organization has properties in development in each of the three urban areas — properties that would get welcome extra attention if the NBC show were beamed from their location.

And that, she makes it clear, is important to her.

"We're looking at those cities, and others, to shoot the show and will decide in the next few months," says the 25-year-old daughter of The Donald. She acknowledges that the series' move this season from New York to L.A. resulted in some ratings lumps, but notes, "The pace has been growing. We're doing better in our time slot than other NBC shows have done — though an audience of 10 million is not 20 million."

Ivanka, who's been featured on several segments of the NBC show, will be on this Sunday's installment and will be aboard, along with brother Don Jr., on the season's April 2 live finale at the Hollywood Bowl. She makes it clear that the TV work is not her first love, however. She prides herself on being a real estate developer — and on the deals she's put together around the world since she joined the Trump Organization in 2005 as part of the development team.

As for how it's been working out between her and brothers Don Jr. and Eric as Trump Organization vice presidents for real estate development and acquisitions, the graduate of the Wharton School of Finance says, "We're all very competitive, all alpha personalities, but we're aware that we can accomplish more as a team, and so we harness our competitiveness and make it work for us."

Any disagreements they might have had have not been grave enough, she says, to call in The Dad.

DAISY, DAISY: Jessica Simpson, Johnny Knoxville and Seann William Scott didn't have much success bringing "The Dukes of Hazzard" to the big screen, but Warner Premiere seems to think they'll have more luck when they release their own adaptation, "Dukes of Hazzard: The Beginning," on DVD. "This one is different from Jessica Simpson's version. That film, in my opinion, was more contemporary," notes "The Beginning" star April Scott, who plays the 18-year-old version of Daisy Duke. "This is going back to the roots of it," she says of the DVD hitting stores this week. "My character starts out really conservative and frumpy, and then halfway through the movie you find out that she has this boy who she really wants to pay attention to her — and transforms herself accordingly."

MEANWHILE: The former "Deal or No Deal" model has the movie "Coma" with Michael Madsen on the way, as well as the horror flick "Nite Tales" with Gary Busey. Scott quickly found say the least, but we got through it," she says of working with the notoriously eccentric actor. When asked if he ever has periods of normalcy, she responds, "Maybe for like three minutes at a time, and then he goes back to being unpredictable. He's a great actor, though. I'll give him that."

EXTRA TIME FOR GOOD CAUSES: Sharon Lawrence says it was a no-brainer to agree to be the spokesperson for EXTRA Cans for the Needy, a nascent non-profit organization of Hollywood extras who collect recyclables from studios and film sets and deliver them directly to the homeless.

"It was really hard to say no to such a good idea and a simple one," says Lawrence of ECFTN, the brainchild of actor Mystery Mike Hennessy, who noted the potential income for the homeless on a set one day. "It's not always easy to recycle. Mystery Mike and his team of extras have taken a lot of the work out of it, and the money clearly goes to the homeless shelters ... money that otherwise would just be forgotten about or even ignored because people don't take the trouble to collect the refund value." Extra Cans for the Needy was invited to be on hand at the Ultimate Green Room at the Oscars, says Lawrence, adding that in just a couple of short months, ECFTN has partnered and/or been endorsed by the likes of L.A. City Council President Eric Garcetti, Tony Shalhoub, Ed Begley Jr. and Global Green executive director, Ruben Aronin. Corporations, school groups, etc, who are interested check out

HE DOESN'T JUST PLAY ONE ON TV: Rondell Sheridan, who plays the White House chef on "Cory in the House" on the Disney Channel — the same character who was a San Francisco restaurateur/chef on the sitcom's progenitor, "That's So Raven" — says he does actually know how to create a memorable meal. He had a hard time getting friends and associates to believe that, however, until "I'd invite them over for dinner and they'd say, 'Hey, you DO know how to cook.'" It finally reached the point, "I had a major kitchen remodel — a complete, gut remodel in my house,," says Rondell. Just the sight of it is now enough to cue people into his culinary bent.
